1: Áli rauðskeggr - New Name & New Device

Quarterly sable and gules, a serpent vorant of its own tail Or

Áli is a masculine given name found on Viking Answer Lady site

<https://www.vikinganswerlady.com/ONMensNames.shtml>

These two names (Áli or Alli) are treated here as one, since when examining runic and place-name evidence, they cannot usually be distinguished. Áli is the diminutive form with the -li- second element of a name from *Ana-, *Anu-, related to Old High German Analo, Anulo, Anilo and Old English Onela, or it may be the short form of ÁlæifR, ÓlafR. Alli may be a short form of names in Al- or Alf-. These names are found in Old Danish as Ali and Alli and in the Latinized form Allo, in Old Swedish as Ale or Alle, and in OW.Norse as Áli. The names cannot be told apart in the runic inscriptions: examples include the nominative forms ali, [ali], al|in|, in the genitive forms ala, [ala], alah and in the accusative forms ala, [ala], [alah]. One or the other of these names may appear in the Anglo-Scandinavian place-names Aletorp, Halebi, Alesbi, Alsebi, Aletoftegata (1200's), and the names Ale (1208), Alli (c. 1270), Ally (c. 1270), though some of these may instead derive from Old English Ala or Alla instead.

rauðskeggr found as a descriptive byname in GB, pg. 26, meaning "red-beard."

Kingdom return from from May 25

initial comments in May by Séamus mac Neill Uí Chonchobhair (Coral) at 2025-05-12 14:09:23

These are not temples drawn over the top of pyramids, which would be two separate items, but as Pimpernell describes above, these are pyramids from Meroe. They are distinct from Egyptian pyramids both in terms of size and because of the temple-like structure at the entrance. Based on what we do know of the history of the area, I'd suspect that the variation of the temple gates sometimes without the pyramid, and sometimes a pyramid without the gates, is the result of 19th century explosive damage rather than a variation on the construction.

I believe the submitter is trying to make a reference to the Kingdom of Kush, which has been largely forgotten thanks to 19th century Europeans who made the claims that these pyramids could not have been built by the inhabitants of the area (for the same reasons that most 19th century revisionist history was written), and trying to help him make that reference would be helpful.

the two never met again.

A day or two after their departure from the capital Yoritomo had led a large force into Suruga province, but he halted on learning that Yoshitsune had left. His vanguard under Oyama Tomomasa and Yūki Tomomitsu had already reached Kyoto, and it was easy for them to persuade the terrified Go-Shirakawa to reverse his edicts and forthwith to issue to Yoritomo an order to punish the two fugitives. Yoritomo, having plainly shown his anger to the In, returned to Kamakura to complete his plans for the foundation of a dominant military society under his own direction.
